

Merkel to step down as CDU leader

What should we focus on next?

Angela Merkel is to stand down as leader of the CDU after her party's dismal performance in the German state elections. Although it had been widely assumed this would be Mrs Merkel's final term as Chancellor, she had been expected to stay on as Chancellor until the next election (on or before 24 October 2021). Her decision will start a battle for party leadership succession, increasing the focus on the party's convention, which will probably take place on 7 December.

According to the media (The Guardian), her likely successors include General Secretary Annegret Kramp-Karrenbauer, former parliamentary leader of the CDU/CSU Friedrich Merz, Health Minister Jens Spahn and the State Premier of North Rhine-Westphalia Armin Laschet. Noteworthy, all these candidates are likely to back similar economic policies to Mrs Merkel, in particular fiscal prudence, though they differ when it comes to immigration (in particular Jens Spahn advocates a stricter immigration policy).

Another focus should be the possibility of early elections. The SPD, currently grand coalition partners with the CDU/CSU, also performed very poorly in the State of Hesse election, raising the risk of the coalition collapsing. Moreover, some in the SPD were concerned that rejoining the Merkel-led grand coalition was misguided in the first place. It is, however, unlikely that elections will be held very soon. If the SPD abandons the coalition and triggers a new election, it may well lose ground to the Green party and AfD. Even if an early election is held, the anti-immigration AfD is unlikely to form a government alone and other parties have ruled out forming a coalition with it.
